SOLARNOVAR

A local company that aims to power homes and businesses with the sun is looking for some talented new employees.

SOLARNOVAR is an off-shoot of the company Triangle Electrical Systems. The new company was formed when its leaders and employees decided they wanted to manufacture a product that enhanced the output of the solar panels that they were putting up.

Greg Brienza, the president of SOLARNOVAR, designed the software for what are called the "trackers."

"What we do mostly is called grid tied," he said. "It connects in parallel with your power meter, so when your power is pushing from the sun it might slow down your meter, stop it or turn it backwards."

The trackers connect to the Internet, monitor the weather and even change position in anticipation of bad weather.

"It was an idea that was born in the north country and we'd like it to grow up and mature in the north country and see if it can get some legs," said Brienza.

The company's looking for salespeople. Also, grant writers with experience.

"Right now the college campuses and the private public they are in need of green power and they are also looking for ways of using some of their endowments to put in solar power," said Brienza.

Eventually, as orders grow, he said the company may add some welding, machining, and electrical jobs.

If you'd like to apply for a position, you can e-mail your resume to roger@solarnovar.com.
